Where Each Employee Feels Indispensable

A Buenos Aires Restaurant's Workers Have Neurological Challenges. That's the Point.

BUENOS AIRES — Noche Venetian's Suárez, whom when he recalls the eight years he spent as an administrative assistant at the Argentine Congress, he was part of a television program for people with disabilities. "They called me they wanted me, they treated me specially," said Suárez, 36, who has an intellectual disability. He was also honored, he added, because he was able to do a job that most people would not do.

"When you go to work and have a purpose, it changes your life."

about his intellectual disability, which he says is the result of having contracted meningitis as a baby. Most are not able to explain their diagnosis, and no one asks them for a diagnosis, and no one asks them if they are hired, Mr. Weinstein said.

Juan Pablo Coppola, 27, says he considers himself "different from the rest" and has experienced the feeling of being a nuisance his entire life in large part because he is not able to do things that most people can do.

"We go to the movies, to drink coffee, go bowling," said Sofia Agüero, 27, a 19-year-old pregnant woman.

She works at an upper-middle-class store and restaurant, Alamosa, in a neighborhood in Buenos Aires. She has a neurological disorder on her own, and she has a son with autism. She is also a mother of a child with autism.

The restaurant, which serves only the lunch and dinner shifts, is particularly sensitive to food and to whom employees work with. It has a strict policy on the nature of the work.

They can help resolve interpersonal conflicts among the neurodivergent staff and can tell if a worker is getting tired and needs a break.

When it first opened, the restaurant was fully booked for weeks and was spreading attention from the news media and famous personalities, including Pope Francis, who is from Argentina.

"I congratulate you on the work you do," the pontiff said in a video message addressed to a group of employees. "You are a unique contribution, a creative contribution from each one of you."

Officials Take Minors Away From a Sect In Guatemala

BY CHRISTOPHER M. WOOD
GUATEMALA CITY
Guatemala's military officials on Monday took away 100 children from a religious sect in the northern highlands, saying the group had been using them to carry out attacks.

Officials said the children were taken from a community in the northern highlands, where they were being used to carry out attacks on government forces.

The children were taken to a military base, where they will be held until they can be reunited with their families.
